Something tells me the 2012 season is going to be all about consistency. The Cowboys have to find consistency in an offense that, for the most part, has struggled to be consistent in recent seasons. In years past, they've had the talent to be a championship caliber team with one side of the ball (defense) going off, but have failed to come through at the other. This year, that failure is looking to be the offense. They haven't been able to consistently move the ball as well as they have in the past. They've had a couple close games where they could have and should have won with some drops, a lot of missed tackles, and a few missed blocks. But with the defense having more to do with the winning and losing of games than the offense, it's hard to come back on the offense when you don't have a lot of quality passes and big plays. The offense did not look good in the preseason (with the exception of a couple games, including one against the Giants where they looked spectacular) but we've come a long way since then. The biggest thing that hasn't changed for the offense is the unit as a whole. The most glaring problem with the offense right now is that Tony Romo has been inconsistent. His inconsistencies have been almost just as glaring as the inconsistencies of the offense as a whole, and he's
