A few weeks ago, we took an in-depth look at how The Hunt really happens in practice, and how it contrasts with how it's depicted in popular culture. But how do "hero" teams get that awesome Hunt trophy? Chances are you've never seen or read about it. But the biggest and baddest animals in the world are hard to capture, especially if they're in the wild. So how do you ensure you're the one to end the life of a dangerous beast in the wild? With the use of tools and procedures. Fortunately, the hunt has evolved over time to make these animals easier to catch. Although your job on the hunt is still to take down a real animal, advancements in human technology have made it a lot easier to get close. Check out our infographic below for the latest hunting methods, tips and techniques. Image credits: Shutterstock, Animalism. The aversive treatment of vomiting in the housebound. Nursing interventions are needed to prevent dehydration and malnutrition in the homebound elderly. This study examines a nurse's use of aversive treatment in the case of a woman who was housebound and noncompliant with dietary recommendations. The patient refused to ingest any of the fluids offered and denied symptoms of dehydration. The nurse used behavioral nursing strategies to educate and coax the patient to receive fluids. The nurse employed several methods to reinforce the response, including an instrumented, computerized bolus-administration system

Q: How to get the line number for a given column number in C? I am working on a function that allows me to print the address of a column to the console. How do I get the line number for a given column number? I do not want to use the line number as the column number, since it might change depending on the file format I am using. I do not want to use the line number as the column number, since it might change depending on the file format I am using.

#include <string.h>
void print_column_address(int column, char *string) {
    int i;
    int column_num = column;
    printf("%s", (char *) string + column_num);
    i = column_num + 1;
    while (string[i] != '\0') {
        printf("%c", string[i]);
        i++;
    }
    return;
}

int main(void) {
    char string[] = "Hello, World";
    printf("The address for the column %d is 0x%x ", 1, print_column_address(1, string));
    return 0;
}

A: Assuming that the file is well-formed (i.e., that the last line of the file consists only of a new-line character), then you can simply compute the line number by multiplying the column number by the number of columns in the file.
```

```
int main(void) {
    char string[] = "Hello, World ";
    printf("The address for the column %d is 0x%x ", 1, print_column_address(1, string));
    return 0;
}
