The bushing is provided to safeguard the blade of a blade-type connector against damage when the connector is not fully seated into a complementary connector. The bushing is dimensioned to fit a standard specification for a blade-type connector, such as the Metric Connector Blade Type NATO standard (MFL-I-NANO). Other specifications may have a different size or thickness than the standard specification. Such connectors are used in the automotive field and in other industries. The bushing is typically a cylindrical, plastic body having a standard standard outer diameter. The width of the bushing is sufficiently small to allow such a bushing to be mounted to a complementary connector. A standard width connector is used to accommodate a standard width connector receiving portion of a complementary connector, for example an F terminal in a female connector. Alternatively, the bushing may be a molded plastic sleeve or a sleeve having an outer diameter that is slightly larger than the standard outer diameter to allow the bushing to fit over the receiving portion of the connector. Typically, the bushing will include a first tapered end portion that has a smaller outer diameter, and a second tapered end portion that has a larger outer diameter. The bushing may have a first portion having an inner diameter that is larger than the standard inner diameter, and a second portion having an inner diameter that is smaller than the standard inner diameter. During installation, the bushing is slipped over the receiving portion of a connector, and the first tapered end portion is received in the female connector receiving portion. The bushing is then crimped over the receiving portion to maintain the bushing to
