Is there ever a time during a cardiac arrest when it is not true that nothing else matters? Drugs are administered in emergency situations for various purposes. That a drug should be administered in a hospital is not at all a law, but what may be common to all hospitals, is that medications are administered in a manner that is reported in the records of the patients treated, with proper regard to patient identity and confidentiality. Specifically, one may have to declare the administration of a particular medication in a report on an airway management or on endotracheal intubation. This is a legal requirement, but it is not entirely about compliance. It is about the proper reporting, so that its relevance to medical practice may be assessed in retrospect and the safety of the patient and the judgment of the attending physician may be discussed with the patient post therapy. This article deals with some important aspects of clinical safety and the safe use of a particular drug in a given situation. A particular type of pharmaceutical intervention that is employed under the supervision of a pharmaceutical facility, pharmacy or a medical laboratory can in principle be a hazardous practice, since the correct and safe use of the
