The province's public transportation agency has authorized the agency to spend $600,000 to develop a technology that will allow provincial transit employees to better answer riders' questions and troubleshoot issues while they're on the move. The technology is part of $1.2 million in investment by Metrolinx to improve "service to the customer," the agency's website says. The service will integrate with existing systems and be available at stations and on TTC bus and GO train platforms, according to the agency. "Having new technology available to our frontline staff is a big priority for us, and can help improve the customer experience," Yvan Baker, chief customer officer for Metrolinx, said in an emailed statement. "Together with our customers, we'll keep using technology to improve our service and provide a better experience." The agency noted that the system will be "different" from existing wi-fi access points that offer free internet. Those will not be replaced. "Our focus is on improving the customer experience, and we don't believe we will have an impact on performance or service reliability," Metrolinx said. The technology is expected to roll out in spring 2016. At the same time, Metrolinx is spending $1.3 million to enhance smartphone apps to better manage Presto card information, add real-time data, and make more information available to Metrolinx customers.
