"Unfortunately, people feel that this is a case where they don't want to speak out for fear of reprisal," said Paul Maguire, one of the lawyers representing the families of the 12 victims in the case. He says that many of the families in the case have hired their own lawyers for fear of being charged. "(They feel) the case is so open and there's so much evidence, and so much evidence that speaks to the fact that the police have conducted an investigation that's extraordinary," he told CTV Toronto. "But they also have information that there are no charges and no investigation. That raises a question of why they didn't take a stand." Maguire says the families of the victims don't have any information to support their allegations of police misconduct and that they would prefer to keep their focus on pursuing justice for their loved ones. "For the parents, the grandparents, they feel that the officers have betrayed their trust and that they have been, in a sense, their own children," he said.
