The devices will still be sold, but you’ll no longer be able to make game apps that aren’t specific to a VR headset. The reasoning behind the move is so that devs can focus more on the Vive—at least, that’s what HTC says. “We are currently no longer accepting new HTC Vive Developer Kits,” the company's developer relations team said in a blog post. "We encourage developers to consider whether they would like to continue developing and publishing VR apps for the HTC Vive as an app and platform, as the focus will be on our current Vive headset offering. If so, we will continue to support existing apps through the regular channels." The blog post gives a reason as to why devs might want to focus on the Vive: it's the most successful consumer VR headset, and there aren't many apps. According to its numbers, though, Facebook-owned Oculus has dwarfed Vive in terms of developer interest and uptake. Facebook's Oculus Go also exists, so there's no need to focus on the consumer headset segment. Photo by ©elysion on Instagram Oculus has also been selling its new Go hardware since last month, so the company clearly has no need to support any of its developer initiatives. Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg said at the Oculus Connect 5 conference in November that he becoming increasingly popular, battery recharge efficiency has not improved to the same extent. Many battery systems experience periodic charging and repeated recharging cycles which eventually decrease battery capacity. The life expectancy of a vehicle which uses battery power to move an occupant must also be taken into account. To improve battery performance, thermal management of the battery may be provided.

For example, a battery may include a thermal management system which directs air-flow to the battery. The thermal management system may include a fan system to move air to the battery. The fan system
