October 7, 2015 This article is more than 2 years old. The days of the part-time entrepreneur are numbered. That's according to a new study that found that most people who quit their full-time jobs to start their own businesses plan to take the leap into the startup life soon after leaving. The study, by a team of US researchers led by Nathan Yau, a management professor at Stanford University, found that 80% of initial quitters plan to launch their own businesses within the year of leaving their job, compared to only 29% of people who take the same job and never quit. In fact, the people in the study who began their own business after quitting jobs were more likely than their peers to start their business within four months of leaving their full-time gig. Although 80% of quitters left to start a business soon after leaving their full-time job, only about 2% of those who never leave their full-time gig will eventually start their own business. "Our research suggests that quitting one's full-time job has a significant influence on one's future likelihood of starting a business," writes the study's lead author. The authors believe their study, which was published in the Academy of Management Journal, "helps provide empirical support for the idea that the probability of starting a business depends on the exit option—in other words, the person's desire to leave and the benefits and costs of leaving." "In particular, our analysis suggests that, given the same costs and benefits of departing, workers in full-time jobs who want to start a business are unlikely to start one if they leave," says the paper. "By contrast, those who want to quit are more likely to go ahead with their plans."In a meat grinder, a quantity of chilled meat is fed into the hopper through a feed slot at the front of the hopper.
