STEP 2 : Click on the downloaded file and extract it then double click on the Release folder you've extracted to locate the rar file and run the install.exe file.Q: Appropriate use of posted code This is slightly conceptual, and I'm looking for an answer in general terms. I'm a programmer in a small company who doesn't have much experience with senior members of his company. I typically hang around the office, and I see a lot of people take my comments to task. They can't stand to hear any criticism, and I've had issues with my boss in the past. Luckily, I'm currently not a full-time employee. I just started up doing this project, and I was assigned to do a lot of "the manager's work." Once it was out of my hands, my boss got into it. Over this past week, I've had management actively antagonize the work I did, and push my project back several weeks. I've started reading about how people should only post the code that they think is correct. I believe they know they're wrong, and they have an explanation for it. My problem is I am not sure what to make of this. Are they just evil? Is it somehow bad for me to post my code? I feel like I should apologize because I feel like I'm going out on a limb, but I'm not quite ready to apologize. I guess the bigger question is: How do I learn what's acceptable, and what isn't? It's easy for me to see what I would do in a situation, and know if I could "hop on board" and do so. But this situation is kinda vague. It's between my boss and my boss's boss. I can't see the fine line between right and wrong. A: What do you want to achieve? I can't imagine a situation where posting some code would be bad (unless it has a NDA in it or an army of lawyers demanded protection of some patents). On the contrary, in many cases, it should be welcomed by other developers since it would most probably lead to improvements (better standards, usability,...). It would be different if the code was secret, but there's no reason at all for you to have any
