For the first time ever in FIFA, this new kind of input is directly integrated into gameplay. Movement is automatically matched with any animation or physics data present in the game. To activate the camera, players simply make moves and they are automatically matched to the other moves and actions that are present in the game. Developers have worked together with the global football community to find the optimal input method for each sport, ensuring that teams are able to improve specific aspects of their game. Therefore, this new technology will take the football community to the next level in terms of realism. HyperMotion technology is being integrated into the following sports: Association Football Club Soccer Cricket Ice Hockey NCAA Basketball NFL Table Tennis Volleyball American Football Baseball Table Tennis Motocross Individual Movements and Team Skills 17 contextual key actions (like sprint, tackle, fake, skill) are used to feed the new player input system, with 18 fundamental moves available when using one of the other available input methods. HyperMotion technology is available for moves like dribble, pass, and shoot, to name a few. Players' contextual key actions are being added in a sequential manner and are tested using a large number of statistical tests. After the hypermotion moves are tested and optimized, developers will take a look at other contextual actions, as well as other contextual actions for players outside FIFA 22. Additional input methods: Keyboard Mouse Controller Motion Capture FIFA 20 introduced an innovative "Sensing System" where players could choose between two different sensors (pre-order by supporting the PS4 "Move" program from the Store or purchase separately for the PS3). Players can use the "Sensing System" to simulate a foot, helmet, hand, or head in the game by using the Kinect sensor, the PlayStation Move controller or a chosen classic controller. The following Controller modes are supported: Head Sensing: the CPU controls the head sensor Athletic Sensing: the CPU controls the foot, hand and head sensors Foot Sensing: the CPU controls the foot and hand sensors This new feature is therefore able to provide a more accurate control and a higher level of interaction with in-game objects. We are now able to simulate the
