I'm used to a culture that has server roles and configurations... so that you can just plug it into the network and get on with it, rather than having to do it all from scratch. I've installed IIS from the control panel, and it runs an instance of Windows Server. This instance of IIS then loads and runs a number of different sites, one of which handles incoming requests for my code. How do I get a console onto the localhost machine to play around and mess with things? It seems this has become a thing of the past. A: You can run a server from the command line. Or you could also use windows terminal services, but then you would have to map an IP address to your localhost. A: In Vista/Win7/Win8 the built in IIS will do that for you. I just tried it and it worked fine for me. In XP the built in IIS is much less friendly. See this link for
