Survival of temporal bone function in vestibular schwannoma surgery: results of repair with temporalis fascia versus dura-pericranial grafting. Surgical treatment for acoustic neuroma with a tumor base in the labyrinth represents a challenging situation. Two different procedures are available: repair with temporalis fascia and dura-pericranial graft. The authors reviewed their experience and assessed their impact on temporal bone function. A retrospective analysis of the last 50 schwannoma operations was conducted. Twenty-three acellular isografts and 27 grafts with dura-pericranium were performed. According to the guidelines of the European Association of Vestibular Rehabilitation (E.A.V.R. guidelines), 21 patients with postoperative follow-up of more than one year were evaluated. Hearing outcome was assessed according to the current E.A.V.R. guidelines and tumoral size was appraised. The degree of facial nerve paresis and hearing outcome were similar after both procedures. The facial nerve was successfully repaired in 80% of the patients with a dura-pericranial graft versus 88% of those with a fascia graft. The need for revision surgery was similar after each procedure. Tumoral size was significantly greater after dura-pericranial graft. Regarding facial nerve recovery, no differences were found between the two types of grafting used in the majority of the cases, but a delay of 3 months for a fascia graft must be noted. This study confirms and underlines the safety of this surgical procedure in schwannoma surgery. A dura-pericranial graft remains a valuable option to minimize the degree of facial nerve paralysis. In small schwannomas, a fascia graft can be proposed in order to reduce tumoral volume, particularly in patients at high risk for revision surgery.// Copyright (c) Microsoft.
