I am developing an app with swift that chats with Facebook messenger using their API. The problem is that if I close the conversation I can't restore it, but if I restore it to another chat, the other one closes (that's ok). The problem is that I can't close the conversation, I get stuck there. Here is my code:

func postToMessenger(messageBody : String) { let userInfo: [String: Any] = [FacebookAppId : "xxxxx", AppSecret : "yyyyyy", SessionToken : token] if (!tokenString()){ let loginView: LoginView = LoginView(frame:.zero) self.view.addSubview(loginView) } let dialog = MessengerDialog(userInfo: userInfo) dialog.shouldTreatAsConversation = true let action: MessengerAction? = [ "message": [ "text": messageBody, "entities": ["emoji": [ "url": "

When we first hear that by the 19th century fat had dominated the human diet, it is natural to think of food and energy prices. But knowing what we know now, what were the "subtle factors" that allowed a similar "economic explosion of happiness" in a previous era before any significant sources of easily-accessible energy were available? While the basic production processes of physical goods (including food, housing and clothing) remained roughly the same, the "subtle factors" that led to long life and other improvements in human well-being would have been very different. How much of the 19th Century "explosion of happiness" was due to the start of cheap abundant energy, and how much was due to other sources, such as advances in public health? It's a question about the 19th Century, and specifically about the "economic explosion of happiness" in industrializing nations that allowed for long life and other improvements in human well-being. But I'd also be interested in the answers to the question for other development pathways, and for other historical eras. A: The first
