I have projects stored in Gitlab project and I want to keep track of my changes. So I intend to write a script in python with Gitlab API to automate the process of creating a pull request. The project information I can get in the API docs. The issue is that my idea is to store all my changes into the project they belong to. If all my changes don't belong to any project, gitlab should throw an error. But I don't want to upload my changes into every projects because it can take forever with the number of project we have. Is there a way to mark which files are belong to which project? A: GitLab team use "repo" service. You can deploy something as git repo, which you would link to any project. If you manage to do something similar with your python code,
