High-energy radiation, both solar and artificial, poses a serious risk to human health, with increasing incidence of cancer and birth defects. Significant numbers of infants are particularly vulnerable, accounting for 40% to 95% of childhood cancer in some US states. UVB radiation is a necessary component of natural sunlight, but its ability to cause DNA damage is exaggerated by reflection from snow, snow cover, cloud cover, and ozone, all of which increase over the polar and continental regions. We outline the major health effects associated with UVB radiation and discuss the various mechanisms by which UVB radiation damages skin cells. Recent clinical and epidemiologic studies show that, by the early third trimester of gestation, UVB radiation can cross the placenta and initiate molecular and cellular events in human fetal skin, including changes in the epidermal microenvironment, inflammatory changes in keratinocytes, thickening of the stratum corneum, and induction of the enzyme 7-dehydrocholesterol reductase. UVB radiation also causes impairment of DNA repair in epidermal cells. These clinical and epidemiologic observations suggest that early life UVB radiation may increase the risk of cancer and birth defects.using System; using System.Collections.Generic; using System.Linq; using System.Text; using System.Threading.Tasks; namespace vid.net.components.transforms { public class NarrowBandFilterEffect : IVideoEffect { #region fields float factor; #endregion #region methods public IReadOnlyCollection GetEffect(int inputFrames) { var outputFrames = new List(); var outputFrameBuffer = new List(); foreach (var inputFrame in inputFrames) { var factor = this.Factor; var outputFrame = (inputFrame + factor) % (float)this.FrameCount;
