Q: Are there any facilities for minorities in or near Shanghai? As I asked here a while ago, I was wondering about this: People here in Shanghai appear to be of many different ethnicities. I have not seen any advertisement regarding the needs of minorities in Shanghai or any government facilities for minorities. Do any of them exist? A: Since one of the key drivers of Shanghai's economic success is its diverse immigrant population, there are several groups that get a bit of government support. For example, the Shanghai's government promotes quite actively the need to integrate: In 2000, the Shanghai Municipal Government recognized the diversification of the city's population and the need to integrate people of different cultures. Shanghai is known for its active promotion of immigrant integration. In 2000, the office of the integration commissioner was established to monitor the development. Office personnel are assigned to an employment and education sub-office to provide technical guidance and services to employment related affairs of immigrants. Additionally, there are several ethnic minorities that are given official Chinese citizenship. This is considered quite special status, where many other groups like the Tibetans do not have such rights. The article about this status is quite interesting, for example: In January 2011, a law was enacted stipulating that a naturalized citizen can only
