He had a problem in practice, where his team were just playing together, and he had no idea how many people were on their team. So, there is also included some version of this with a "people in the match" counter at the bottom of the screen, which then can be easily added to, if your engine allows it. Apart from being a neat idea, I think it is quite simple and could be very useful in games. ~~~ kps And this works because CS:GO teams are large; you have to be looking through a viewport the size of the entire arena to hope to count all the players. ~~~ devonrt You'd never know that because CS:GO teams are usually fairly small. In the past, the most popular map was Dust2, which is only 12'x8'. You'd never see all the players in one side.
