Inhibition of type-II collagen-specific and autologous cytotoxic T lymphocyte responses by myeloid dendritic cells. To analyze the influence of the dendritic cell (DC) maturation state on type II collagen (CII)-specific and autologous CII-specific cytotoxic T lymphocyte (CTL) responses, monocyte-derived dendritic cells (Mo-DCs) were matured in vitro with TNF-alpha and LPS or with interferon (IFN)-alpha. Both matured Mo-DCs were able to induce the proliferation of allogeneic CII-specific and autologous CII-specific T lymphocytes, although to a lower extent than matured DCs derived from peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMCs). Adhesion molecule expression, antigen uptake, and allogeneic as well as autologous CII-specific T-cell proliferation were significantly increased on Mo-DCs when compared with mature PBMC-derived DCs. Moreover, LPS-matured Mo-DCs were able to induce the secretion of TNF-alpha and IFN-gamma by autologous CII-specific T cells. Although the effector/target ratio was always lower on Mo-DCs compared with mature PBMC-derived DCs, Mo-DCs matured in the presence of IFN-alpha enhanced the recognition of autologous CII-specific T cells. In conclusion, Mo-DCs are able to induce allogeneic and autologous CII-specific T-cell responses. The increased expression of adhesion molecules and the potential to stimulate autologous CII-specific T cells suggest that immature Mo-DCs may play an important role in the recognition of self-Ags and the initiation of autoimmune disease.
