Roblox is the free, fun online game platform for kids and families. It allows users to make their own games, play games created by other users, and share and play games together in one place. Roblox is free for all users, and players can play for free without having to make any purchases. However, players can spend real money to buy virtual items as an in-game currency. At any time, new items may become available through free-to-start games or limited-time events. Children who do not wish to make any purchases can create a free account and enable the game setting "Kid-Proof" to restrict the purchase options to virtual items that promote imagination, creativity, and social interaction. In 2008, Google announced its bid to build an interactive game portal to rival the then-dominant Nintendo DS and Sony PSP. The brainchild of then-Google product manager Will Stofega and Google employee Steve Lee, the project was named Project Toybox. Instead of implementing its own in-house game engine, Project Toybox planned to use the Adobe Flash platform, which uses web technology and online connections to create and run interactive games. The first beta version of the software was publicly released in the Fall of 2008 and an official version was released the following April. Will Stofega, who is now Product Management Director for Google Chrome, explained the company's thinking: "With the maturity of the Flash platform over the years and its considerable resources and momentum, Google wanted to give it a try. We felt it was time to stop just experimenting on our own and start doing it in public with our biggest clients." Project Toybox was officially canceled in October 2009. In late 2009, DreamWorks Animation was exploring a possible new console project, and hired Google's Will Stofega to consult on a potential console project. Following this, a closed beta of DreamWorks' Altered Beast was distributed for download through the Google App Store on iOS devices, though the game was later pulled from the store due to quality concerns. ==Company== Google (2004-Present) Google is an American multinational technology corporation specializing in Internet-related services and products.
