A 27-year-old man was admitted because of sudden pain in the right side of the chest. Chest radiograph revealed a bullet 4 cm in length lodged in the right diaphragm with central displacement and occlusion of the right pulmonary artery. On emergency exploratory laparotomy, the hernia was found through the central tendon of the diaphragm. The muscle edges were closed and no mesh was placed.

The patient had an uneventful recovery and was discharged 10 days after surgery. The clinical course of this case demonstrates that herniation of viscera through the central tendon of the diaphragm can be mistaken for bronchopleural fistula in chest trauma and that central displacement of viscera may occur without muscle perforation. In addition, use of mesh for diaphragmatic repair does not prevent secondary herniation.
