A: Foreign keys are not created for the sake of performance. They exist to reduce the risk of referential integrity violations. And unfortunately to implement it you do need to perform a JOIN. Every index you define should correspond to a unique constraint, foreign key or primary key in the referencing table. The foreign key definition requires a row to exist in the referencing table to establish the referencing relationship. The primary key definition requires a row to exist in the referencing table to establish the referencing relationship and to be unique. So you are currently doing it the easiest way. Think about the last time you checked your social media feeds. Were you scrolling through Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, or even Snapchat?
