As discussed in my article on the Incel phenomenon, there are two main reasons why social media platforms are important for understanding and communicating about the phenomena of radicalisation, which have increasingly arisen in the most diverse forms of social media such as Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and WhatsApp. One reason is the emotional quality of social media, which is characterised by its immediacy, spontaneity and ease. As some critics have argued, it is precisely this quality that has enabled social media platforms to become a more important and reliable forum for the communication and expression of opinions than the traditional media which have been subject to online censorship and demonisation. Another reason why social media are crucial for understanding and dealing with these phenomena is their prevalence in many countries, which is the reason that the phenomenon is increasingly expanding into other countries, despite the possible attempts of repressive forces to censor and persecute people who express and share their opinions in these platforms. The ‘autonomy’ of social media However, in spite of the explosive growth of these phenomena in different countries, we have only begun to study the characteristics of these phenomena and their causes. These studies have to understand the relation between the phenomenon itself and the underlying social forces that create the conditions in which these phenomena emerge and last. The creation of these factors and conditions is a very complex and multifaceted process in which some of them act as drivers and others act as stabilisers. At the same time, the characteristics of these phenomena can be explained by examining those social forces, and their interaction, in different social contexts.
