The article deals with the acute inflammatory reaction of the lung and the role of ROS in the inflammation. Some chemical and biological aspects of the antioxidative system of the lung are considered in respect to the study of acute lung inflammation. The role of the phagocytes (neutrophils and macrophages) is assessed in relation to ROS production and the activation of proteases and phagocytic receptors, as well as the involvement of lipoxygenases, cyclooxygenases and the role of lipid components. The authors of the article emphasize the paradoxical and dual nature of ROS. On the one hand they are harmful and on the other hand they promote the repair of the damage. Some aspects of enzymatic protection are described and attention is paid to the antioxidant properties of humoral substances. The authors point out the effect of hemopexin on the reduction of lipid peroxidation and the role of the ceruloplasmin in the protection of tissues against ROS.Q: How to implement session timeout in JSF?
