A question that may be on many users' minds, especially those using Lightroom for the first time. Lightroom is an Adobe Application made specifically for the organization of large image collections and the coordinating of their manipulation. It can be viewed as a Camera RAW extension or a full-fledged image editing software. Naturally, once the initial installation of Lightroom is done, you need to apply various levels of control and organization so that the data associated with your collection of high-resolution photographs is presented in accordance with your wishes. With version 5 of Lightroom, you can now tweak your organizational settings such that the appearance of a particular object with the type of picture, exposure, and light, as well as its dimensions can be set by you. As you can see from the screenshot above, the Organize button brings up a dialog with three tabs that assign the selected image and its related photos to the location where you want them to go. The Automatically Associate Image with Lightroom, New or Collection tabs will make sure that the image and its related photos will start appearing as handpicked options in Lightroom, even if you have not selected any keywords or tags. Together with the Edit, Spot Removal, Effects and Custom Presets, we have four tabs for organizing your collection of images. The last four are the most important, and each of them is discussed below. Let's begin with the last tab, which is the most commonly used one. It helps to pre-modify your newly scanned or shot photographs when downloading them into Lightroom, so that Lightroom can better present these new images to you.

The options to do this are:

- Linear
- Curves
- Sharpness
