Along with a vast library of options, Adobe Photoshop has a big collection of pre-designed templates for all your web and print publishing need. All of these templates are suitable for photography, but can also be used for anything you can imagine. Just be sure to select the correct template or it will show up as a warning if it's not found and you'll fall into the wilderness forever. Photoshop is a powerful program, but it won't design Guernsey Mermaids with it. So, if you need some professional assistance, or maybe if you don't want to get... Finally, I'd be remiss if I didn't talk about the user interface. I have a huge pet peeve about licensing software online. Unless I know for certain that a software vendor is trustworthy, I refuse to download anything off the Internet. I know it sounds goofy, but at the same time, I've had the most trouble with (rather than from) payware. I don't mind paying for software, but I'm not willing to license it over the Internet unless I'm absolutely positive that I'm going to like it. It's that time of year again, when Adobe is pushing a bit of a plug-in for Lightroom, that lets you pay for it (as long as you have a Creative Cloud). The thing is, it's only $44.96 a year for three licenses (just $22.92 a year for 2), or half off the normal price. Still, I'll wait until I have a credit card that supports Adobe Creative Cards before I start using it. I hate it when companies do that. That said, I have to admit that it's a great deal. The version 5.0 update of the software retails for $89.99 for a single license. It's $44 for a subscription. As Omelette pointed out, this is actually what you're supposed to be paying for the software, and if you wanted an even bigger discount, you could go to FotoKem and buy their version of Lightroom 5 for $47.00 for a month. So even though I don't trust Adobe since the whole "hacking into their database" thing, and even though you should never use anything if you're not sure you like it, I am pretty stoked about Lightroom 5. Workflows are still somewhat limited, but they're growing every day. You don't need to be a guru to use it either.
